ABSTRACT

In Cameroon, one of the malaises of scientific research in History is based on methodological beliefs. Each existing methodological protocol imposes itself as a catalog of irremovable beliefs. The methodological belief and the methodology of beliefs are illustrated when two scientific protagonists come from two different institutions, although exercising in the same field. This is the logical consequence of the lack of harmonization of writing standards in historical sciences, the result of the confrontation of different methodological protocols in History marked by specific methodological rationalities and the audible substrate of public defenses of theses and dissertations. Each individual is haunted by the methodological approach of his institution and not very flexible to the contributions of others.
